Stethoscope Ceremony

Welcome to the Stethoscope Ceremony, our annual celebration to mark the transition of our Year 3 students into clinical training. Although our students encounter patients from the earliest stages of their course, from this point on their training is largely in clinical environments. They are attached to teams or spend time in specialist hospitals learning the essential skills and knowledge necessary to become a doctor.

Rather than a conventional 'white coat' ceremony, we host the Stethoscope Ceremony for several reasons. Trinity clinicians and graduates were instrumental in pioneering the development and use of the stethoscope. William Stokes, one of our Regius Professors of Medicine and a pioneer in the field of cardiology, wrote the first book in English on the use of the stethoscope when he was still a medical student. His colleague Robert Graves, a founder of the principle that student doctors should be taught at the patient's bedside, popularised its use in clinical practice. Finally, in 1851, Arthur Leared, a graduate of the School, invented the modern binaural stethoscope with two earpieces connected to the bell by rubber tubing.

To us the stethoscope represents centuries of our commitment to clinical teaching and the importance of innovation and adopting new techniques and evidence. It emphasises the importance of bedside skills and, as we tell our students, is used to listen to our patients, which is a fundamental part of becoming a doctor.

As our student doctors take to the wards in the 21st century more often in scrubs than in white coats, they must begin to learn and apply the ethical and professional principles of the profession. To mark this, at the end of the ceremony we ask the students along with their teachers to affirm the Declaration of Geneva. This pledge is the modern successor to the Hippocratic Oath that has been taken by physicians for two and a half thousand years. It highlights the values, ethical principles and professional responsibilities shared by all in the medical profession across the world.
